1. The bill expands the stated policy of the Maine Human Rights Act to include the prevention of discrimination in employment on account of work injury, occupational disease or the exercise of rights under the workers' compensation laws.
2. The bill specifies that, in civil cases in which a complaint with the Maine Human Rights Commission has been filed, the statute of limitations does not begin to run until the commission has finally disposed of the matter.
3. The bill specifies that, in civil actions in Superior Court in which discrimination is alleged to have occurred, the parties have a right to a jury trial and to compensatory damages including the value of past and future lost wages, past and future fringe benefits and attorney's fees.

Committee Amendment "A" (S-215) clarifies the language added to the policy statement in the Maine Human Rights Act to parallel the language currently contained in the provisions prohibiting unlawful discrimination. It strikes the provisions extending the statute of limitations and authorizing a jury trial and certain types of damages when intentional discrimination is alleged. It adds a provision permitting a complainant to receive attorney's fees and civil penal damages if the complainant brings a civil action when the Maine Human Rights Commission has issued a right-to-sue letter indicating that it has not filed an action or entered into a conciliation agreement within 180 days of a complaint being filed with the commission. The amendment also adds a fiscal note to the bill.
