fish in all navigable streams, just as it has in other public waters, despite the fact that the beds of the streams are owned by riparian owners.

If the stream is not navigable, then section 53 of Chapter 33 of the Revised Statutes permits the riparian proprietor to enclose the waters of such stream.

To General Spaulding Bisbee, Director of Civil Defense and Public Safety Re: Authority in Practice Alerts

The letter you supplied. . . written by Norman A. Wood, Director, Civil Defense, at Auburn, concerns what authority the Civil Defense officials would have in any practice alert.

As indicated in his letter, there appears not to be any authority for taking any action which would be disturbing the peace or compelling civilians to take shelter in the absence of an emergency proclamation by the Governor.

The extent of the practice alert can be measured by the cooperation of the public, as there is no authority to do otherwise.

To Marion E. Martin, Commissioner, Labor and Industry Re: "Workshop"

... You inquire if the word "workshop" includes restaurants, retail establishments, laundries, and dry-cleaning establishments.

While the term "workshop" is to some extent elastic, it has been held that the term as used in the Factory Act meant a shop where any manufacture or handiwork was carried on, whether for the purpose of repair or of manufacture. It is usually associated with power-driven machinery constituting hazardous employment.

From the definitions I have found of this term, it does not appear that any of the institutions named in your memo would properly be termed a "workshop".
