the court finds the plaintiff has presented sufficient evidence to substantiate the alleged harassment;

when reasonable, the court or plaintiff makes an effort to notify the defendant that the plaintiff is seeking a temporary order; and the court provides written reasons for its temporary order.

The bill's provisions for a full hearing, issuance of a permanent order, and enforcement of an order are similar to those existing in the statutes providing for protection from domestic abuse. The bill also makes harassment as defined in the bill a Class D crime. Finally, the bill requires the State Bureau of Identification to collect information on incidents of harassment.
