SUMMARY

LD 731 proposed to expand the definition of "employer" as used in the statutes governing employment conditions to include any public employer.

Committee Amendment "A" (H-143) restricted this expanded definition by simply providing that a public employer is required to pay for any physical examination that it requires of an employee or accepted applicant. The amendment also clarified the definition of the term "accepted applicant" and the means by which an employer could pay for the physical examination.

"Professional strikebreaker" was defined to include any company that had on at least 3 occasions in the previous 5 years provided at least 100 replacement employees to employers involved in labor disputes. Security guards, special maintenance workers and previous employees of the employer were exempt from the prohibition.
