SUMMARY

Currently the employee of an owner of real estate is exempted from needing a real estate license in order to sell this real estate, if such a sale is "incident to his usual duties." Prior to 1987 the employee was exempt if the sale was "in the regular course of or incident to his usual duties." The committee was told that the board's rules do not include "in the regular course of" and were, therefore, in conflict with the old law. The effect of the 1987 change was that employees of golf courses or skiing facilities that sell condominiums owned by these businesses as their major duty were required to have a real estate license. This bill returns the law to its status prior to 1987.

There are 2 important items of background to this bill:

1. In the abstract, an argument could be made that the definition of "incident to" would include "in the regular course of". However, this argument would be hampered by the legislative history, in that the prior use of the term "in the regular course" would tend to indicate that the Legislature defined them differently.
2. The committee was told that it was not the intent of the Legislature in 1987 to eliminate the term "in the regular course." This elimination was apparently made in preparation of the report, with the explanation that the deleter considered the change technical not substantive.

Committee Amendment "A" allows employees of owners of condominiums to sell these condominiums without being a licensed real estate broker. It adds a public member to the Real Estate Commission.
